Dear schoolmates and friends:

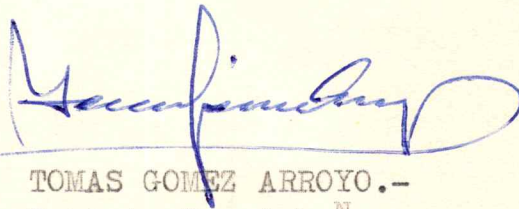

Best wishes to all of you in the new year.
The last was not a very bad one to the Arroyo's since we had the pleasure to finish it if not whealthy at least healthy and happy.

Antonio and Miguel are here. Both of them are attending the University, while Nena and her family came for Christmas.
The only absent was the elder of the boys, the one who never stayed with us in the States.

Instead of traveling he prefered to get marry and so he did. He won his licence in Biological Sciences being this fact testified by a splendid diploma. The only problem with them is that a diploma is not enough to keep their souls and bodies together. Anyway, thing will get better..... I hope.

Vivi and myself are very very sad not being able to stay en Newsport for the big N.C.C. Reunion. Next time perhaps.

Sincerely

TOMAS GOMEZ ARROYO.-

Dear Classmates and Friends:

Just a few lines to keep you informed of the Arroyo's life during the year '77, which is drawing to a close. As you can see, we are still in Chile hopping to prolong our stay for another year.

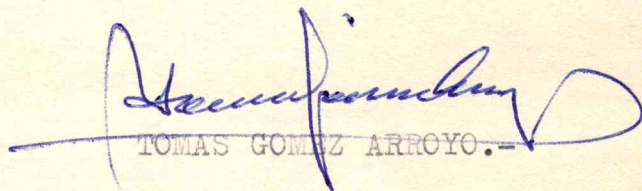

Our family is increassing; very slowly, but at least increassing. Only a few days ago, Nena presented with us, our first grandson, who is N°3 in seniority in the context of the Arroyo's third generation. I could not tell you why but it gives me the idea of being something like a V.I.P..... I am dusting off the cap we received in the USS "Kitty Hawk" when we were honored by the U.S. Navy in the spaceman way. Unforgetable!.....

Last March we drove across the Andes to Buenos Aires, having the pleasure of meeting the Vergnauds who are, believe it or not, the only friends from the NCC Class of 1973 we have met since the day we left Newport.

I would like to take this opportunity to tell those of you who are interested in Chilean history, geography, folkore, etc that our home is ever open with plenty room.

Best wishes to all of you for 1978.

Sincerely,

TOMAS GOMEZ ARROYO.

Dear Admiral Pita da Veiga,

The students of the Naval Command College (NCC), Class of 1973, graduated from the Naval War College on Saturday, 30 June 1973. I take great pleasure in informing you of Captain Tomas Arroyo's achievements while participating in the academic activities throughout this past year. I am certain that his year was significantly enriched by a close professional and personal association with officers from the 31 other Free World Navies comprising this year's NCC class and the remaining student body of the Naval War College.

The beginning of the curriculum of the Naval Command College this year provided the students with the opportunity to study the history of sea power and become familiar with U.S. governmental organization, institutions and practices. This was followed by a separate management orientation course and a period devoted to international relations. In addition, the Naval Command College was integrated with the U.S. senior course during a major portion of the Management Study given during the second trimester. The contribution of the Naval Command College students was impressive during this period. After the completion of the integrated Management Study, the students conducted an in-depth study of naval operations and applications. A detailed, two-sided war game was the conclusion to these programs. In early June of the last trimester, the NCC students joined with all their U.S. counterparts in committee development of regional strategy papers. Upon completion of these tasks, the Naval Command College students participated with the other colleges and high ranking military and civilian leaders in the Current Strategy Forum (CSF) which has replaced the Global Strategy Discussions (GSD) held in previous years.

Concurrently, during their stay at the War College, the students traveled extensively around the United States on Field Study Trips. This allowed them a unique opportunity to become familiar with U.S. institutions, industry, and military installations while exposing them to various areas of the diversified American culture.

Captain Arroyo has had a distinguished year at the Naval War College as a result of his excellent professional and personal contribution. Early in the academic year, the presentation of his country essay, both in writing and verbally, indicated the high level of achievement which he would attain throughout the remainder of his year at the Naval War College. His country essay was perceptive and reflected the considerable insight he possessed of his country and the entire European and African area. The papers he prepared during the Management Study clearly demonstrated the sound understanding he has acquired in this important subject. In the third trimester of the year, Captain Arroyo was the Commander of a mine task force in a two-sided war game. His performance was superb, greatly enhanced game play, and added, in a substantial way, to the effectiveness of the entire undertaking. During the Regional Strategy Study and Navy Mission Area Paper phase in this final trimester, his participation in a committee composed of U. S. and international students contributed in an important way to the completion of an exceptionally concise and expert area study paper. Later, Captain Arroyo contributed materially to the Current Strategy Forum which marked the final phase of the year. Throughout the year, Captain Arroyo impressed all with whom he came in contact as a very experienced, professional and extremely friendly naval officer who could be relied on to contribute mature, expert ideas and conclusions to all undertakings. Captain Arroyo always reflected considerable credit on himself, his Navy and country.

Captain Arroyo and his gracious wife Vivi participated extensively in the social functions, both official and unofficial, connected with the College. As both hosts and guests, they were exceptional ambassadors of Spain. Upon their departure from the College, they left a number of close friends in both the military and civilian communities.

It has been a distinct privilege to have had Captain Arroyo as a student at the Naval Command College this year. I am certain that his experience has been most profitable, both academically and professionally, and should be of great value to both our countries in the future. He is a highly motivated and professionally qualified officer of whom we at the Naval War College are extremely proud to have joining the distinguished ranks of our international alumni.

Sincerely,

STANSFIELD TURNER

Dear Commander Arroyo,

It is my pleasure as Director of the Naval Command College to welcome you as a member of the NCC Class of 1973. Enclosed is a General Information pamphlet concerning the College that I hope will prove to be useful in planning for your visit to the United States. A copy of the Curriculum and several brochures will be sent to you when they become available. They will be more specific and will be helpful in acquainting you with the nature of the studies you will pursue while you are here at NCC.

We hope that circumstances will permit your family to be with you this coming year in Newport. Our experience has shown that officers who have their families with them have a much more enjoyable visit in the United States. We realize that housing will be a major concern to you should you bring your family. No unusual difficulty is anticipated in obtaining permanent housing for you, although temporary housing may have to be utilized until the popular Newport summer season is over about 4 September. Since temporary housing is expensive and in short supply, you might wish to consider having your family join you shortly after classes begin. In any event, please do not let housing arrangements discourage you from bringing your family as we look forward to having them with us.

Commander K. L. Wright, a member of my staff, has been assigned as your Military Sponsor. He will soon write to you and will be prepared to aid you in all possible ways, both in preparing for your trip and after your arrival in Newport. Please let him know of any problems or unanswered questions, no matter how small they may seem.

I am looking forward to welcoming you to Newport in person. In the meantime, please feel free to write to me or your sponsor.

Cartagena, October, 1.974

Dear Friends,

As it was previously decided, my first appointment after the Naval Command Course was the Executive of the V.A. in the Navy Yard of the Cádiz Naval Zone, in which I stayed until last May. In spite of that, from January to April, I had to attend another High Command Course, this time in the Spanish Naval War College, Madrid.

In the meanwhile, Vivi, Antonio and Miguel were at Cartagena, since the school they attend, -(the boys only, of course)-, before going to the U.S., kept their places in regarding the 73 - 74 school year. As a matter of fact, they worked very hard and successfully. Antonio is now in his first Electronic Course, while Miguel is doing his best in the last year of the High School. Both of them are living here, in our own home, but they miss America and their friends...

From May, the 3rd, I am the proud Commodore of the 21st DD's Squadron, expecting to be in the same role for a 18 month period. Our home port is Cartagena, where we should be very happy in receiving our good friends... until the next November, '75. After that my future is completely unpredictable...

Very often we talk about Newport, the Naval War College and the people we met there, while projecting the movies and slides we took along our stay in the U.S. It is one of our favorite hobbies.

The best to all of you.

Sincerely,

-Tomás G. Arroyo-

Dear schoolmates and friends:

We have failed this year in sending our X'mas cards to all of you, but being a good chap, I promise to do my duty the next December

In fact, we have been very busy. Moving our home from Cartagena, (Spain), to Santiago, (Chile), has prove to be a fairly hard job, which had to be done by the time people employ in exchanging their greetings cards.

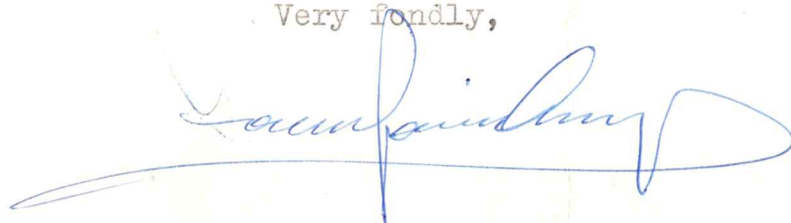

As you have already guessed, I am the Naval Attache in the Spanish Embassy, in Santiago de Chile, hoping to stay here for a three years period. Vivi and Antonio are here too, while Miguel will join us after completing his studies in Spain, probably by the next July. A happy family again....!

We take this opportunity to wish to our good American friends, as well as the whole U.S.A. Nation, all the best in this 200 Anniversary of the Independence. Unfortunately we are not attending the big N.C.C. old students assembly. The C.S.F. has a lot of very interesting problems to be discussed, and we are longing for visiting our friends from New England, but... Anyway, we will be there, in spirit.

Best wishes and professional success to my dear and distinguished colleagues from our 32 different Countries belonging to the Free World...(does this sentence awake any remembrance to you?), and peace and mutual understanding all over the World.

Very fondly,

Dear School mates and friends:

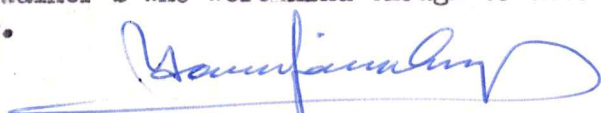

Just a few lines to tell you about the Arroyo's. Along the past year we have had either bad ^{and} good events but, summarizing, I would not hasitate in classify it as a very sad one.

To begin with my father died last spring after five months of inactivity. He used to say that he became an old man in November, 12th a 14:00, thirty-five days before his 96 birthday.

Vivi and myself have been alone since we came back from Chile, where we left Antonio ^{who} is still there while Miguel, in Tenerife, is ^{in his second year} studying his second year in Architecture.

My job has been hard and difficult but, after two years of perfoming my duty as Director de Reclutamiento y Dotaciones, I was selected for a new role. A few days ago, (January, 9th) I took over as Jefe del Mando de Escoltas, which includes all our frigates, corvettes and destroyers. My home port is El Ferrol where I hope to see you soon.

A special mention for the Walker's who were kind enough to devote a few days to us, in Madrid, last October.

FORWARD

It is not easy to speak about Spain. It is an ancient land whose soil has known so many different civilizations that no precise definition is possible. Spain is one and many at the same time, and no single glance could possibly take in all its complexity. It has been called a "miniature continent" and everything tends to confirm that picture. It is seen, physically, in the contrasts among its various regions - forests and steppes, rugged mountains, cliff-bound coasts, and sweeping beaches, and among its different peoples - varied in race, in language and in customs. This whole complex, colorful world is SPAIN.

CHAPTER I. - GEOGRAPHY

The Iberian Peninsula, - Spain and Portugal - takes the form of a pentagon, bound by rocky coasts. The American writer, John A. Crow, in his book "Spain. The Root and the Flower" described my country in this way: "Spain is like a grand castle that rises from the sea. The entire perimeter of the country is marked by ranges of mountains. Within the ring of these soaring walls of granite, lies the courtyard of the castle, the vast tableland of Castile."

There is an insular Spain, made up of the Canaries and the Balearic Islands, and an African Spain, consisting of the cities of Ceuta and Mellila and the Province of Sahara. The Greenwich Meridian crosses the eastern part of the country, with the majority of its territory lying to the West of this line. In size, its 300,000 sq. miles of territory, make it the third country in Europe, while it ranks seventh in population with 33,000,000 people.

The population density is 110 per sq. mile. Given the physical characteristics of the country, the population is very unevenly distributed. The high central tableland, dry with a continental climate, especially in certain parts of Castile and Aragon, is less heavily populated than the lower coastal regions where living conditions are more favorable. Thus, Galicia, Catalina, the Basques Provinces, and Valencia, have the highest density of population.

CHAPTER II. - OROGRAPHY

The Central plateau is 120,000 sq. miles and has an average altitude above sea level of more than 2,000 feet. It includes Castile, Leon, and Extremadura. Flanking it are the lateral depressions formed by the valleys of the Ebro in Navarra, Aragon, and Southern Catalonia; and the Guadalquivir, dominating the greater part of Andalusia, and the great mountain ranges which mark its boundaries.

Golden, sandy beaches, such as La Concha, el Saedinero, and Torrelavega, along the Cantabrian Coast; Torremolinos Benidorm and Costa Brava, over the Mediterranean Sea and the well known Canarian beaches in the Atlantic Ocean, are always full with plenty of tourists who contribute to spread the name of Spain all over the world.

CHAPTER III. - CLIMATE

The climate of Spain is as varied as its scenery. In these latitudes, the weather should be mild and temperate but the abruptly changing geography and certain marine currents cause wide diversities in climate. For this reason, Spain knows all four seasons, although there is always some region where the climate is mild, the sun warm and the temperature, even in summer, is pleasant and temperate.

In winter, Alicante, Murcia, and Almeria, have an exceptional climate, with temperature of 55 and 60° F., even in January and February. Spring is lovely in the East and Balearic regions, while Fall is classically gentle and mild in Madrid and its region. Generally speaking, the whole Peninsula in this season offers agreeable weather with clear and blue skies and bright sun.

CHAPTER IV. - HISTORY

To resume in a few paragraphs the whole history of Spain, - about 2,000 years -, is really a hard problem. Nevertheless, I shall attempt to give an idea of the varied events, the most characteristic of them which in a wide way, may we call basic and fundamental.

Its location at one end of the European Continent and its nearness to Africa, have given Spain an enormous strategic importance, and have made it the object of encroachment by many varied cultures. From a thousand years before Christ, through the 8th Century of our era, the Iberian Peninsula has aroused the ambitions of a while series of invaders, who brought it into contact with the great civilizations of the world.

Romans, Visogoths, and Arabs, remained in Spain for long period and produced racial crosses and cultural infusions which were definitive in the formation of the Spanish character. The illustrious historian, Menendez y Pelayo, in his study about the Spanish character, points out that the unity of language, followed by the unity of belief as a consequence of Christianity, were the fundamental pillars of the unity of Spain.

The Roman Era began with the glory of Spanish unification. During the reign of Fernando and Isabel, not only was the country joined together religiously, politically, and territorially, but one of the transcendent events of history took place: The New World was discovered. With only a few men and three small ships, Spain, began the conquest, conversion, exploration and colonization of the New World.

Following the above mentioned author, John A, Crow, in the description of events that brought Spain at the top of its glory, we may say that "the principal resource of Spain was then, as it always had been, the vital energy, the boundless determination, the incredible thrust and will of its people". Under Carlos I as Emperor, Spain became the greatest power in Europe and America. His son, Felipe II was able to maintain the political strength, but during the rule of the last King of Austria, Carlos II, the decline as a European power began.

The House of Bourbon started a new era in which there were many benefits in the life of the people and the whole country came into a closer contact with the rest of the European culture.

During the Contemporaneous Era, Spain gained by the new ideas coming from the French Revolution. This event, together with the Napoleonic invasion, brought to Spain a new sort of liberal, political idea, which the people tried to assimilate with goodwill, but little success. The 19th Century was the one in which Spain lost its overseas possessions and, at home, serious problems of succession to the throne. The Republican period is followed by the National Movement which restored peace and prosperity to Spain.

CHAPTER V. - SOCIETY - THE SPANISH CHARACTER

The Spanish character is historically associated with a deep religious feeling, a firm ethical and traditional base, an unbelievable individualism and a special concept of honor that has marked the personal shape on the people.

The Spanish theory of existence makes life subordinated to the achievement of an ideal. In the land of Don Quijote, a man is less interested in what he is, than in what he should be.

Nevertheless, each region has its own peculiarities, which make differences between people in them. For example, there is nothing in common between Gallegos and Catalanes. They even speak different languages. It enhances the vitality of local, regional sentiments, which are still alive after centuries. But such characteristics does not disturb the idea of a Spain as "a unity of destiny on the universal plane", for all regions have contributed to the embellishment of Spain and its history.

CHAPTER VI. - SPAIN, A TREASURE-HOUSE OF ART

Spain is a great museum where there are to be seen every facet of artistic endeavor. From the prehistoric painting on the walls and roofs of the Altamira Caves, (Santander) down to the works of Picasso, Spain has never ceased to produce numerous and varied works of art. The whole country is literally covered with castles, palaces, monasteries, and cathedrals of unusual artistic worth. In them are valuable collections of sculptures, paintings, jewels, and tapestries. The Roman remains begin with the astonishing aqueduct, in Segovia, and run through Merida and Tarragona to the ruins of ancient Italiza; bridges, arches, and roads from the Roman period, may be seen everywhere in the country, many of them in a very well conserved state.

Some Spanish cities are representatives of a particular style, of a specific art form. Cordoba and Granada shelter the master works of Musulman Art, and in their towers, mosques and palaces can be read the whole brilliant history of the Califate and the Kingdom of Granada. Sevilla offers, against the white background of its buildings, the grace of the Giralda, which, with the Mezquita in Cordoba, and the Alhambra in Granada, make up the most famous body of eastern art in Spain.

The long centuries, during which Arabs and Christians lived side by side, produced the purely Spanish-Moorish Christian style, Mudejar or Mozarabe, of which magnificent examples are to be found everywhere.

The Way of Santiago was the most important cultural development of the Middle Age. From Roncesvalles to Compostela, the Romansque left its imprint on the churches and sculptures along the route, reaching its peak with the Holy Door in the Cathedral of Santiago. At the same time, in the Piranean-Catalan region Romanesque murals were everywhere, forming a great collection, which can be seen today in Barcelona.

In its great expansion, the Gothic covered the Peninsula with many different monuments, such as Toledo, Leon, Burgos and Segovia's Cathedrals.

The Renaissance in Spain produced a number of interesting variations which may be seen in the monuments of the period. One of these is the Herreran Style, sober and grandiose, whose principal example is the Escorial, erected by order of Felipe II to commemorate the victory of Saint Quentin, in 1557, over Henry II, King of France. The Escorial itself, has come to be the representation of an era and a way of life. Salamanca, on the other hand, preserves the finest examples of the ornate Plateresque, which gives the city the appearance of being decorated with golden lacework.

The Prado Museum in Madrid, one of the world's greatest treasure-houses, contains the finest collection of Spanish painting, in addition to the works of El Greco, Zurbaran, Velazquez, Murillo, and Ribera. Special mention must be made of the works of Goya, the influence of whose genius is still felt in art today. His colossal life work, broke all the rules and was the forerunner of daring developments in technique.

Towards the end of the 19th Century, a deep preoccupation with all aspects of art, gave birth to a complex world in which the most diverse tendencies found supporters. Gaudi created a light-hearted architecture, which is a source of admiration today. Sorolla pointed out to the world of the sun and the blue waters of the Mediterranean region, while Gutierrez Solana searched in the shadows for another face of Spain. Through the great body of their work, Picasso, Juan de Gris, Miro and Dali, restored Spain to its leading position in the world of the art. Many names are associated with the most recent developments in art and architecture, particularly the Valley of Fallen - a Civil War Memorial - which adds a finishing touch to the great list of Spanish Monuments.

In music, Spain has produced some good composers. Among the earlier ones, Tomas Luis de Vitoria is outstanding in the choral and religious themes. In modern times, Granados, Albeniz, Falla, Turina, Halffter, and Rodrigo, form the elite. A singularly Spanish genre is the Zarzuela, a type of popular light opera, with spoken parts, in which the Spanish character is successfully represented.

CHAPTER VII. - EDUCATION AND CULTURE

The new system of studies, comprises the following stages: basic, general education (between the ages of 6 and 13); secondary bacalaureate (between 14 and 16); an initiation course for the University; a first cycle of University to obtain a diploma; a second cycle to obtain a degree; a third cycle to obtain the specialization and finally, the doctorate. Furthermore, occupational training (for which the Labor Universities and Professional Schools are most important) and technical training are also available. In Spain, there are also 164 Teachers' Training Colleges, 12 cities have universities, while another eight cities possess one or more faculties.

Technical training is provided by the higher education technical schools in several cities like Madrid, Barcelona, Bilbao, Las Palmas, etc. There are also official and private schools for fine arts, applied arts and crafts, cinematography, journalism radio and television, tourism, etc. People who cannot attend regular educational centers, may follow the Radio Bacalaureate program, broadcast by Radio Nacional de Espana, which is supplemented by private broadcasting stations.

The Institute of Hispanic Culture has done great work; it is specially dedicated to cultural exchanges with the Spanish American countries, with which we have strong historical religious and cultural ties, quite apart from the common tongue. Next door to the Institute itself, stands the Museum of America, in the University City of Madrid.

Another of the most interesting cultural achievements is the Summer University and the courses for foreigners which are followed by people from many different countries, specially for students from Latin-America, Portugal, the Philippines, African countries, and the Arab world. To give an idea of the Spanish output of books, the figure of 35 million is very significant; most of them were shipped to America.

CHAPTER VIII. - POLITICAL STRUCTURE

Spain is a Catholic, Social and Representative State, which in accordance with her tradition, is constituted a Kingdom, as defined by the law and passed by popular referendum in 1947. Since 1936, the lifetime Headship of the State, has been held by Generalissimo Franco, who in accordance with the Law of Succession, has appointed as his successor, Prince Juan Carlos de Borbon, who will therefore be Spain's future King.

The Head of State is assisted by the Government, composed of a Vice President and 18 Ministers.

The Spanish Constitution is formed by the ensemble of so-called Fundamental Laws, all of which have been passed and can only be modified or repealed by the referendum of the whole nation.

Among these Laws is the "Fuero de los Espanoles" or Bills of Rights, for the individual; The Labor Charter or "Fuero del Trabajo", establishing the legal principles which are to govern the system of labor in Spain, in accordance with social justice; the Law known as the Basic Principles of Movement, defines the essential ideas that inspire the actions of the Spanish State.

The nation's participation in government is carried out through the Cortes or Parliament, according to the system of representation of organic democracy. The Cortes has a sector representing the Trade Unions, another for the Municipalities of the 50 provinces and the third sector representing the family as a unity. A seat in the Cortes is also held by a certain number of personalities, by reason of their public office. A small group of deputies are designated by the Head of State.

There are also a National Council of the Movement, a Council of the Kingdom, a Council of State, a Supreme Court of Justice and other bodies of long-standing constitutional tradition.

Laws are prepared by the Cortes and sanctioned by the Head of State. The National Council has the mission of watching for faithful compliance with the fundamental Principles of the Movement, rather like a tribunal of constitutional guarantees.

All Spaniards over the age of 21 are entitled to vote, without discrimination as to sex.

CHAPTER IX. - MINING AND INDUSTRY

Iron, lead, zinc, and mercury are well represented in the Spanish soil, but the country suffers from a scarcity of energy minerals (coal and petroleum). That is why Spain has been striving for over 40 years, to solve this problem by using "white coal". The national gold, copper, silver, lead, tin, and iron deposits have been mined since about 3,000 years B.C. In ancient times, the Iberian mines were renown, but today, are almost exhausted as far as precious metals are concerned.

Traditionally, one of the leading Spanish industries has been textiles. In former times it was centered in Castilla but for the last two centuries, has been concentrated mainly in Catalonia. Wool, cotton, and silk, are worked in many spinning and printing mills. The main industrial areas in Spain are: Asturias, (where there are rich mines and outstanding iron and steel mills), the Basques Provinces and Santander, with foundries, steel mills, heavy machinery manufacturers, chemicals and dairy by-products; Catalonia with car manufacturers, locomotives and other heavy industries, besides textiles; and the Central Zone around Madrid with metallurgical, chemical and ceramic industries among others. The food industry is scattered all over the country; flour in the inlands areas, olives in Andalussia; vegetable canning in Galicia and Andalusia; wine-growing in Catalonia, la Rioja, La Mancha and Andalusia, etc.

In recent years, the automobile and household electrical appliance industries have been developed very rapidly.

Spain exports large quantities of very high quality goods, but is obliged to buy abroad others which the country lacks, at least in sufficient quantities to cover national needs, such as petroleum, coal, machinery, etc., and exports products such as machinery, olive oil, combustible minerals, ships, automobiles, trucks, and tractors. The Spanish foreign trade, in 1969 was: Imports - 269,305.4 and exports - 133,022.5 millions of pesetas.

CHAPTER X. - FOREIGN POLICY

"Europe is needing a united, stable and prosperous Spain, so in the future, I can see her fully integrated into the European organization. The evolutionary factors, working together with some other dynamic process will give, sooner or later, this result", said the Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs in an interview he held, last July, for the "ABC", one of the most important newspapers in the Country.

One or two days before, the Minister of Industry, during his speech at the inauguration ceremony of the VII Feria Internacional de Muestras, (a display of international industry achievements) at Bilbao, the capital of Basques, had said: "The economic policy is to join Europe and this is an objective which can never be confused. We want to become a member of the E.E.C., with the same rights and the same duties they have and without neglecting our special characteristics, because this community wants each country with its own peculiarities". Both of them, two top members of Spanish Government, had outlined the purposes of our foreign policy beyond any kind of hesitation.

Spain is a part of Europe and she has a role to be played as a member of this society. I am sure we will do it.

The close family relationship between the Ibero-American countries and Spain, is underlined not only by the possession of a common culture and language, but in fact, by the continuous presence of thousands of their sons in Spanish universities, where many of them receive their higher education and broaden their training.

CONCLUSION

Spain is a land with a long history open to all, and wishing to become fully a part of Europe. Spain maintains her friendship with all nations and tightens the bonds of brotherhood which link her, in a special way, with the Spanish speaking nations. After the American discovery, after the first circumnavigation of the world, Spain won the legend she proudly shows in her coat of arms: "PLUS ULTRA". And she knows, too, that "Noblesse oblige."
